

In 1873, the English mathematician William Shanks unveiled a calculation which had taken him fifteen years to complete: the value of pi to 707 places. In 1949, the first electronic computers calculated pi to 2,035 places (in three days) and found that Shanks had made a mistake; the last hundred digits – roughly two years worth of calculations - were wrong!

